His Version of the Conflict of the Third Corps with Longstreet's Force. Gen. Sickles's version of this conflict is particularly interesting at this time. A reporter met him at his comfortable home recently and found the veteran seated at a 500-year-old Moorish desk presented to him while he was minister to Spain.

"Yes," said Gen. Sickles in answer to the reporter's query, "the only time I have spoken of this battle in a public sense was in 1864, when I gave testimony before the congressional committee charged with inquiring into the conduct of the war, but my duty then was to answer only such questions as the committee put to me. The part that the Third corps took in that battle can only be understool by those who either were there at the time or have examined the position since. I am aware of the great amount of criticism that has been directed towards me for not prolonging the line of the troops who had been gathered on and near Cemetery hill, and because I went out on the heights and selected an advantageous position where I could quickly detect every movement that Longstreet made. The fact of the matter is there was no order of battle, nor was there the slightest preparation for a battle that day. When Longstreet made his formation and swung his troops on to my left there was nothing for me to do but attack. I could easily have held my own against an equal force, but it was absurd to imagine that I could check or beat back the right wing of the Confederate army.

"The overwhelming force brought to bear against me made my line untenable and I called for reinforcements, realizing that defeat of my corps meant the flanking of the army and the interposition of the enemy between the army and the capital. I called upon Gen. Hancock, who had always been kind and cordial to me, and he sent me regiment after regiment. The gallant Weed, of the Fifth corps, came to my aid-poor Gen. S. H. Weed, who was killed that same afternoon on Little Round Top, and on whose breast Lieut. Hazlett, who was in command of Weed's old artillery battery, and who was also shot by a sharpshooter, fell while he was leaning over to hear his chief's dying words. And poor Zook, of the Second corps, who fell in the wheat field later. In response to Warren's appeals for help from Round Top I let him have Weed, for I was confident that with the help I then had and with reinforcements from the Fifth corps, which responded an hour after I called them, we could at least hold the field. I lost in that fight over 4,000 men."

"General, is it true then that Gen. Meade was dissatisfied with your po-

"There had been a sort of council of war that morning and all the corps commanders had been requested to attend. Gen. Meade sent for me; I declined to go because I was convinced I would have trouble with the enemy before I could return. Finally a positive order came from Gen. Meade. I mounted my horse, a thoroughbred Kentucky hunter, and galloped to headquarters. To Gen. Meade I imparted my apprehensions of an attack and asked him to accompany me back and inspect my line. He made light of my fears and declared that I was always imagining that I was about to be attacked. However, he directed Gen. Hunt, his chief of artillery, to look into and Gen. Hunt approved it. Even while Gen. Meade was ridiculing my apprehensions the booming of guns on the left denoted that the fun had begun. Although the three day's strife at Gettysburg is termed one battle there were actually three conflicts-Reynolds' fight on the first day, my fight on the second day on the left and the third day, the last expiring gasp, the hopeless charge by Pickett's gallant fellows on the center, repulsed by Hancock.

In regarding the battle of Gettysburg people are apt to dwell upon the third day's fight, because it puts an end to the business. The heavier work of the first and second days is apt to be overlooked. At the end of the second day Lee had but one fresh division, Pickett,s, while we had the Sixth and Twelfth corps. Lee was out of ammunition. Gen. Graham, who was wounded and taken prisoner, told me that the Confederates had but few rounds of ammunition left and were exceedingly demoralized and broken up. When a rumor was spread among them that the Yanks were going to charge there was always a stampede. We had the choice of position. We had repelled two successive attacks on our right and left, and our left, though ap-parently the weakest part of our front, was in reality the strongest from the na-ture of the ground. Besides, we could swing in reinforcements from either the right or the center. I hold that had not the Third corps broken the back of Longstreet's corps on the second there never would have been a third day at Gettysburg.-New York World Interview.

A Curious Magnetic Clock.

A new French clock contains a novel application of the magnet. The clock appears like a tamborine with a circle of flowers painted on its parchment head. Around the circle crawl two bees, the larger requiring twelve hours to complete the circuit, while the smaller makes it every hour. The flowers represent four divisions, and the bees, which are of iron, are moved by two magnets, carried just under the membrane, by the clock-work inside the tamborine.-Arkansaw Traveler.

An Ingenious Way to Advertise. The Germans have devised an ingenious method of advertising their manufactures. A vessel fitted up with a complete assortment of German products has been sent on a voyage round the world. It serves as a floating industrial exhibition.-Philadelphia Call.

Killing Fish in the Canary Isles. One day when we were on the beach peering about among the pools at low tide, we saw three men come to the edge and gaze intently into the water, pointing at something therein with great earnestness. A couple of them immediately stripped to their trousers and waded to an outlying rock. Standing thereon for a moment and shading their eyes with their hands they again carefully peered into the water. Then I saw one of them throw something into the sea. It was a small cartridge of dynamite, which in a second exploded, casting up the water violently. The cartridge had a ruse, which was lighted from one of their cigarettes-for all were smoking. Apparently every one smokes all the time. Instantly after the explosion the men sprang into the waves and swam energetically thither. Then we saw that they had flung the torpedo into the midst of a school of fish, and that it had stunned many of them, who were floating helplessly on the surface. One man carried a cord, on which he strung them through the gills as fast as they were picked up; and thus they bagged in a few minutes fourteen nice fish of five or six pounds' weight each. The men seemed as much at home in the water as ducks.-Canary Isles Cor. De-

The Tree-Killer of the Isthmus. One of the forest curiosities of the isthmus of Darien and lower Central America is the tree-killer (matapalo.) This starts in life as a climber upon the trunks of large forest trees, and, owing to its marvelously rapid growth, soon reaches the lower branches. It then begins to throw out many shoots, which entwine themselves all around the trunk and branches, and also aerial tendrils, which as soon as they reach the ground take root. In a few years this gigantic parasite will completely envelop the trunk of the tree which has upheld it, and kill it. The whole of the inner dead tree will then rot away, leaving the hollow matapalo standing alone and flourishing .-

The Farmer's Plow in India. The farmer of India uses a plow made of a piece of iron a foot in length, an inch wide and half an inch thick, which is sharpened at the lower end and fixed in a triangular piece of wood attached to the yoke on the necks of the bullocks by a rope of manilla grass. This plow tears up the ground like a harrow, and by hard work can be made to go over nearly an acre of ground in a day. The operation of plowing is repeated five or six times before each sowing, or about ten times a year, as two crops are raised. After the last plowing the sower follows after the machine and carefully drops the seed into the furrow. - Boston Budget.

The Blowing Cave of Georgia. In Decatur county Georgia, is situated | leans. a remarkable cavern calted the Blowing cave. The entrance to the cave is thirty feet long and twenty feet wide and is about twelve feet deep. It has two openings, through which it is said to breathe. It draws in air in the forenoon and blows it out in the afternoon. A person who places his ear near one of the mouths will hear a noise resembling a loud roaring of wind. It is thought | ble and address Registered Letters the cave has some connection with the to gulf of Mexico. The owner says he often goes to its mouth on hot evenings and gets a refreshing breeze. - Chicago Times.

The Antiquity of the Harp. The antiquity of the harp appears in the fact that the ancient Egyptian frescoes contain harps that are 3,000 years old. Bruce gives some copies of paintings in 100-gated Thebes of a harp in the tomb of Rameses, thus showing that before Athens was built the Egytians used this instrument. Bible readers know King David's favorite instrument was the harp called kinnor. It is said that when hung over his couch the wind caused the strings to sound at midnight-the principle of the æolian harp.-Exchange.

The Profit of Growing Lobsters.

The close watch kept by the authorities in Maine to prevent the sale of "short" or small lobsters has given rise to a new industry. Last fall a firm bought a lot of small lobsters and put them in a forty-acre pound in a cove at Vinal Haven. They were fed liberally through the winter on fish heads and like food, and now weigh from two to six pounds each, and bring $10 a hundred pounds in the Boston market.-Ex-

White Ants Found in Illinois. Not long ago the floors and other wood-work in the house of John Wilson, of Mount Palatine, Ills., began to give way. An examination showed that most of the wood in the house had been fairly honey-combed by white ants and rendered utterly useless. The ants are described as resembling those of Africa.— Chicago Journal.

One Use for Slippery-Elm Bark. Slippery-elm bark is a good remedy for scaly boilers, and, though successfully used for a number of years, is as yet not extensively known. It is placed in the boiler and left there, the scale falling off in flakes and sheets, which should be removed immediately. - Chicago The Decrease of American Tonnage.

In 1870 the American flag floated over 597 sea-going merchant steamers, having a tonnage of 513,792 tons, while in 1885 the number of such vessels had fallen to 255, and the tonnage had increased to only 545,187 tons.
